

Conduction:

The transfer of heat energy from one substance to one another through direct contact. Heat transfers from the warmer part of the object to the cooler part of the object.

Convection:

Transfer of heat through the movement of particles. Convection occurs in liquids and gases. This occurs in a circular motion as warm particles rise and cooler particles sink.

Radiation:

Energy that travels across distances as certain types of waves.

